Introduction

The contents of this collection range from Rogers Fence Company, founded 1887 to the closing of William Bayley Company in 1998.

The collection consists of 18 Hollinger boxes.

The collection is divided into 10 series consisting of 731 files, 105 books and binders, and 2000+ photographs.

Series 1: History

Series 2: Projects and Related Information

Series 3: Catalogs

Series 4: Plant and Facilities

Series 5: Patent Files

Series 6: Manufacturing Processed Books (5 boxes)

Series 7: Photos of Buildings with Bayley Windows

Series 8: Product Photos

Series 9: Unknown Photos

Series 10: Articles

Biography*

* This is a partial history of the Bayley Company as recollected by Mr. Robert Bayley until the company sold in 1964.

In 1875 William Bayley at the invitation of his brother-in-law, James Dicus, came to start a new life in Springfield, Ohio from Wilmington, Delaware. At that time, a financial panic was gripping the East coast while in comparison Springfield was an agricultural boomtown producing a wide array of agricultural products. He landed a job at the Whiteley Reaper Company and perfected a failing Company product, a knotter that tied up wheat in bundles as it was harvested. Yet that did not reverse the company fortune when it went bankrupt in 1887, leaving William Bayley once again on his own resources.

In partnership with his brother-in-law, William Bayley acquired the Rogers Iron Company which made a wide variety of iron fences and lawn mowers. By 1890, he controlled the company and renamed it The William Bayley Company. Though a self-taught man with no formal college education and an apprenticeship in Wilmington, he was by trade a mechanical engineer. He made his company an experimental iron works shop by producing whatever he invented. In time, he has held more than 100 patents on inventions ranging from a gas engine to tobacco cutters.

In 1913, he built his first metal window in a building where the Huntington National Bank downtown is now located. He expanded into house casement windows but did not stay long. The company's main focus became institutional buildings such as schools, prisons, hospitals, and government office buildings. By 1920, the company started exporting metal windows abroad from China, Canada, and Mexico. The company tried diversification by acquiring an almost defunct manufacturing company of agricultural products. The E.W. Ross Company which made metal silos and corn blowers became a division of the William Bayley Company.

By the 1930s the company learned how to weld aluminum and started making aluminum windows for the next 25 years. They were durable and could last forever since the outside part of the aluminum window oxidizes and forms a protective coating to the secondary layer. The company's primary specialty became prison windows which provided the bulk of its business even to this day. A company truck line was formed in 1946 to solely transport their products.

The William Bayley Company was sold in September 1964 to a New York businessman Walter Weisman. The company name was kept intact. Four years after its acquisition from the Bayley family, the new owner died, leaving the company to his estate and was sold another four years later to the present owner, a Lebanese businessman living in Switzerland. Again the company name was kept.

The growth of the William Bayley Company was a tribute to the founder's hard work and Victorian values that was kept going by his sons in an ever changing world. The company was never a big profit business since it had to go after jobs that had great volumes yet acquired with low bids, hence, the margin of profit was not great. Yet the Bayley family made a good living but were not rich by high standards.

Scope and Content

The collection was donated soon after the plant closed in 1998.

While this is by no means a complete collection, it should give some idea of the company and its products through the years.

After going through the photos it was realized that the photos should be divided into pictures of buildings and pictures of product parts; as this was decided later, there are some product parts mixed in amongst the building photos.
